gluttony and nostalgia over an old-fashioned treat called the turkey pardalakki. Touted as the “best Greek food you’ve never heard of,” the dish was created by Athens restaurateur Athanasios Voulgaris more than 50 years ago. His classic recipes are simple: steeped in olive oil, often spiced with Turkish red pepper and sprinkled with garlic, it’s served, nearly always, in crisp, crusty, nearly empty Greek cafes and tavernas. The dish itself is a modest creation — maybe even an acquired taste. It’s a large chunk of turkey, sometimes baked slowly with onion, herbs and spices, sometimes roasted on a griddle; it’s loaded up with cheese, sometimes with tzatziki, topped with a generous amount of chopped olives. It’s usually served, often with a bowl of marinated feta, in a big, rambling, crowded, ouzo-sauced room. Voulgaris never stopped tink
