Infection with P. acnes is associated with a variety of diseases. While the majority of P. acnes isolates are non-encapsulated, encapsulated variants can arise in vitro. Recent work in our laboratory suggests that bacteria in an encapsulated form are much more pathogenic in vivo than non-encapsulated organisms. This is supported by a direct comparison between an encapsulated and a non-encapsulated strain in the porcine arteriovenous shunt model where encapsulated organisms are more pathogenic than non-encapsulated organisms. The mechanisms involved in this greater pathogenicity are not known. The innate immune system is activated by P. acnes in vivo in response to this infection, thus there is a need to understand P. acnes interaction with the immune system. Monocyte/macrophage colony-stimulating factor (M-CSF) is an important cytokine responsible for the differentiation, maturation, and activation of monocyte/macrophages. P. acnes produces and secretes a compound(s) into the supernatant that downregulates the production of M-CSF in vitro. After removing this activity, P. acnes is less immunosuppressive in vitro than it normally is. Therefore, we hypothesized that the down
