In the week after Trump's surprise November election win, a source familiar with the matter said that Trump personally approved the payment by his son-in-law, Jared Kushner, to porn actress Stormy Daniels to halt her legal claims against the president. The payment, which was first reported on April 25 by The Wall Street Journal, was reportedly made in 2016, a few days before the election, and for which the source of payment was not disclosed. The source said that there was no coordination between the White House and the Department of Justice and no one in the White House instructed the attorney for the president to pay the money to Daniels to keep her quiet. Another source close to the administration told Bloomberg News that no one at the White House or in the Justice Department has any knowledge of the payment. "The president has never discussed with us or anyone in the White House any kind of payment involving Stormy Daniels," one Justice Department source said. A second source confirmed that the U.S. government has no active or pending investigation into the payment. The source said that the U.S. attorney for the Southern District of New York, who is handling the criminal investigation into Michael Cohen's payments to Daniels, is not investigating the payments. Justice Department spokeswoman Kelly Laco said she could not comment on specific cases, but when asked whether the payment to Daniels was being investigated, she said: "All matters of probable cause will be investigated by the U.S. attorney." A lawyer for Cohen, who did not respond to requests for comment, called the accusations of an investigation "patently false." He called the payment made to Daniels and another woman, former Playboy model

Karen McDougal, “completely legal and appropriate.” I Heard From My Friend In a private conversation days after the election, in which Cohen was traveling with Trump d0c515b9f4
