love. Meet the palm-sized, palm-worn, widely-used assistive technology in the laboratory. It is YOU at the lab window! In the presence of the computerized testware, the gloves, the ear-plug and even the glasses, the Proximal Reach Assessment takes place in a way that is easy to remember, easy to execute, and easy to accomplish. With a combination of a haptic feel and the back and forth motion of the right and left arm, the multi-component testing method will tell you what you need to know about your assistive technology. Test the table height, the sit-to-stand option on the table, the back and forth movement, the arm motion and the vision acuity, all in one test session.

This is the kind of information that will allow you to make an informed decision about what's appropriate for you. And just like the medical tests that are needed, the Proximal Reach Assessment is as important as an ear-plug for hearing or a glove for hand use. This is a drumstick test that you'll love to use! If that's not enough, you'll really love hearing about this new tool that was developed in conjunction with a well-known organization that you already know and like. You'll love this idea
