Understanding Layer Basics As an artist, you may not realize it, but Photoshop is a visual editing tool. Your creation is nothing more than a 2D mask containing a series of individual layers, and these layers are arranged inside a mask. The way Photoshop works is that a layer, or group of layers, works as a single, cohesive unit. For example, if you were to create a basic background for a page in Photoshop, you would likely make the background a single layer. Then you would put text or another element in the foreground, such as a logo or a photo. In creating your image, you might use various layers to accomplish different tasks. For instance, you may draw the character with a brush, then adjust the canvas with another brush and then paint in the background.

Q: Is there a function for pdf data? I wrote a program that generates a pdf. And I need to export that data in an array format to that program. Is there a function that is used to get the pdf data from an image? A: If you want the actual raw bits you can try something like: `image = imread('lena.jpg'); bits = im2bw(image,0.5);` If you want to access the colour channels a bit more specifically: `channel_names = {'c','y','m','r'}; channel_values = {zeros(size(image,1),1), ones(size(image,1),1),... ones(size(image,1),1), ones(size(image,1),1)}; for channel = 1:numel(channel_names) channel_values(:,channel) = image(:,:,channel_names{channel}); bits(:,channel) = im2bw(channel_values(:,channel),0.5); end` The above gives you the colour images in the bits that are stored as an image. The image data you have in the bits is not the same type as the colour images in an image. That said there may be another approach that is more in line with what your asking. If you use the packages above (or similar packages such as: you can use `fastwrite` to write out the data in a format that the image processing software expects. The code would be something like: `for channel = 1:numel(channel_names) p1 = fastwrite(channel_values(:,channel),size(image,1),size(image,2),size(image,3)); p2 = fastread(p1,'P6'); p3 = fastread(p2,'Image',[128,128]); p4 = fastread(p3,'Image',[32,32]);`
