Efficacy of Non-Surgical Adjunctive Treatment for Gastroparesis in Children. Gastroparesis is a common problem in children. The goal of this study was to evaluate the efficacy of a six-month course of therapy for gastroparesis using objective and subjective scoring systems in children. This is a prospective cohort study with outcome variables measured by a pre-test and post-test design. The setting was an academically affiliated children's hospital. Data were collected from children between 8 and 18 years of age receiving medical care for gastroparesis. A nonsurgical treatment group of ten children, with symptoms of gastroparesis for one year or more and with normal upper gastrointestinal anatomy on upper endoscopy and abdominal ultrasound were enrolled in the study. An age and gender matched ten control patients were also enrolled to match for illness duration and severity. Outcome measures were compared before and after six months of treatment. Gastric motility, gastric emptying, and subjective symptoms improved in the treatment group compared to controls over six months.Catalysis of Li(2)/InCl(4)-promoted ring-opening polymerization of propylene oxide.
