Special problems include underrecognition of mild and subclinical disease, difficulties in discriminating between exanthematous or encephalitic fevers and other differential diagnoses, confusion between some encephalitic and nonencephalitic fevers and limited accessibility to the brain for biopsy or histopathologic examination. Encephalitis is frequently clinically misdiagnosed and difficult to differentiate from acute disseminated encephalomyelitis. The sudden rapid progression of symptoms, which involves the brain, could be mistaken for an intracranial hemorrhage. Consequently, emphasis is placed on early diagnosis and prompt recognition. This usually requires a neurologic assessment of higher centers, with lumbar puncture for cerebrospinal fluid examination. Because of the variable clinical manifestations, immunologic or genetic testing is not usually useful. To provide a better prognosis and to determine the cause of encephalitis, an elevated index of suspicion is helpful. Timely diagnosis and specific management, based on an understanding of the clinical features of the particular illness and known pathogens, are essential. Pathological changes in the autonomic nervous system are responsible for significant morbidity and mortality in patients with heart failure. The basic mechanisms that control the balance of cardiac sympathetic and parasympathetic innervation are still unclear. The overall objective of this proposal is to characterize the basic mechanisms of reinnervation of both sympathetic and parasympathetic nerves. This is accomplished in the isolated canine heart with a combination of neuroanatomic, neurophysiologic and physiological techniques. The specific aims are to: 1) identify the extent of reinnervation, as a function of time; 2) identify the precise region and depth of reinnervation
