Firmware 2.2..The evolution of longevity. The availability of data on lifespan and longevity has recently become more common, and this provides an opportunity to study the evolution of human longevity. This review summarizes various facets of human longevity and addresses the question, what have we learnt from the historical record, both about factors that influence human longevity and about the tendency of female aging to be slower than that of males. More specifically, this review discusses the evidence on the beneficial and detrimental effects of living to a young age, the relationship between human longevity and measures of life history trade-offs, the hypotheses of aging rate to be either faster or slower than life history trade-offs, and the association between senescence and the human plague. Empirical evidence on the
